Why the humble fridge magnet became one of the most personal gifts you can give — and how to get yours right the first time.

1. Why Photo Magnets Never Really Went Away

Think about the last time you stood in someone's kitchen waiting for the kettle to boil. Where did your eyes go? If that kitchen is anything like most, they drifted to the refrigerator door. It's a funny little gallery when you stop to look at it: a wedding invitation from two summers ago, a kid's drawing held up by a souvenir from Lisbon, a strip of photo-booth pictures, maybe a pizza menu nobody will ever admit to using. And more often than not, right there in the middle of it all, a handful of photo magnets — tiny printed moments that somehow survived every kitchen clean-out, every move, every "we really should declutter this fridge" conversation.

That's the thing about photo magnets. They don't ask for wall space. They don't need a frame, a hook, or a level. They just stick — literally and figuratively. In an age when we take thousands of photos a year and print almost none of them, a photo magnet is one of the few ways a digital memory becomes a physical object you'll actually see every single day. Not buried in a camera roll. Not archived in a cloud folder you haven't opened since 2019. Right there at eye level, next to the milk.

There's also something quietly democratic about them. A framed canvas print says "this is our best photo, formally presented." A magnet says "this is a moment we loved, and we wanted it around." It's casual in the best way. People stick up the slightly blurry one where everyone's laughing. The one where the dog photobombed the engagement shot. The one that would never win a contest but somehow gets a smile every time someone reaches for the orange juice.

And practically speaking, magnets solve a real problem. Most printed photos end up in a drawer or a box in the closet, admired maybe twice a decade. Photo books are lovely, but they live on shelves. A magnet earns its keep: it holds the grocery list, the school permission slip, the recipe you're meaning to try. It's a memory with a job. That combination — sentimental and useful — is exactly why photo magnets have outlasted trend after trend in personalized gifts. They were popular twenty years ago at mall kiosks, and they're arguably more popular now, because the quality has caught up with the sentiment. Modern printing means your magnet can look like a tiny gallery print instead of a washed-out novelty.

So whether you're here because you're planning a wedding, hunting for a party favor people won't throw away, or just tired of your best photos living and dying on your phone, this guide is for you. We'll walk through what custom photo magnets actually are, why couples have fallen in love with wedding photo magnets and save the date magnets, how to pick photos that print beautifully, and the small design decisions that separate a magnet people keep for a decade from one that quietly slides behind the fridge.

2. What Exactly Is a Custom Photo Magnet?

Strip away the marketing language and a photo magnet is a simple object: a printed image bonded to a magnetic backing. But "custom" is where things get interesting, because today almost every part of that simple object can be tailored to you.

The image itself is the obvious part — your photo, your artwork, your words. But customization goes further. You choose the size, from little two-inch squares that look like miniature instant prints up to generous four-by-six rectangles that show off a landscape shot properly. You choose the shape: classic rectangles and squares, circles, hearts, even rounded corners that give a softer, more modern feel. You choose the finish — glossy for punchy, saturated color, or matte for a softer, fingerprint-resistant look that photographs beautifully. Some people add text: names, dates, a short line of a song lyric, a hashtag from the wedding. Others keep it clean and let the photo do all the talking.

The construction matters more than most people realize, and it's worth a quick detour. A good photo magnet has three layers working together. On top, the printed image — ideally produced with photo-grade printing so skin tones look like skin tones and the blues in your beach photos don't turn muddy. In the middle, a protective surface that shrugs off kitchen steam, splashes, and the general chaos of fridge life. Underneath, the magnet itself, which needs to be strong enough to actually hold things. A flimsy magnet that slides down the door under the weight of one takeaway menu is a disappointment wearing a nice picture. A proper one holds several sheets of paper without budging and stays exactly where you put it for years.

Flexibility is another detail worth checking. Many quality photo magnets are printed on a flexible magnetic sheet, which means they conform to slightly curved fridge doors, don't crack if they're bent, and survive being dropped on tile. Rigid magnets have their place — they feel substantial, almost like a tile — but flexible ones are the workhorses of the fridge world, and they're usually the safer choice for gifts and favors, since they travel well and don't chip.

It's also worth saying what custom photo magnets are not. They're not novelty items with clip-art borders unless you want them to be. They're not low-resolution giveaways. Done well, they're small, durable prints that happen to stick to metal — which is why photographers have started offering them as add-ons to wedding and family sessions, and why couples have started treating them as stationery rather than trinkets. The category has quietly grown up.

One more practical note: because magnets live on fridges, filing cabinets, lockers, and magnetic boards, they get handled. People touch them, kids rearrange them, someone eventually uses one to pin up a coupon. That daily handling is actually the point — it means your photo gets seen constantly — but it's also why print quality and a decent protective finish aren't luxuries. They're what keeps your magnet looking like a keepsake in year five instead of a smudged rectangle.

3. Wedding Photo Magnets: Small Favors, Big Feelings

Let's talk about wedding favors for a moment, because there's an uncomfortable truth most couples discover too late: a lot of favors get left behind. At the end of the night, after the dancing and the toasts, venues routinely collect boxes of abandoned sugared almonds, monogrammed shot glasses, and tiny jars of local honey. It's not that guests are ungrateful. It's that most favors fail one of two tests — they're either not personal enough to matter, or not useful enough to pack. Wedding photo magnets pass both tests in one move, which is why they've become such a favorite among couples who want their favor budget to actually mean something.

The psychology is simple. A favor with the couple's faces on it is not something a guest leaves on the table, because leaving it feels oddly personal — like leaving a photograph of your friends behind. And once it comes home, it doesn't get tucked into a junk drawer with the matchbooks. It goes on the fridge, where the guest sees the couple's happy faces every day for years. Your wedding becomes a small, permanent fixture in the daily lives of everyone you love. Try getting that result from a koozie.

There are a few popular approaches to wedding photo magnets, and they suit different kinds of celebrations. The most classic is the engagement-photo magnet: a favorite shot from the engagement session, sometimes with the couple's names and wedding date in an elegant corner. These double beautifully as favors and as reminders of the date. Then there's the photo-booth magnet, which has become a genuine highlight at receptions — guests take pictures in a booth, and the prints are turned into magnets on the spot or shortly after. Guests leave with a magnet of themselves having the time of their lives at your wedding, which is about as close to a guaranteed-kept favor as exists.

A third approach couples love is the "thank you" magnet: after the wedding, a favorite photo from the day itself — the first kiss, the confetti exit, the two of you laughing at the sweetheart table — gets printed as a magnet and mailed out with thank-you cards. It solves two tasks at once and gives guests something far more memorable than a card alone. Months later, when the card has been recycled, the magnet is still there, holding up a preschool drawing in someone's kitchen.

From a planning perspective, magnets are refreshingly low-stress as favors go. They're light, flat, and unbreakable, so they travel to destination weddings in a carry-on without drama. They work for every guest — no worrying about alcohol-adjacent gifts for non-drinkers or food gifts for guests with allergies. They suit every age, from your college roommate to your grandmother. And they display beautifully at the reception: arranged on a magnetic board by the guest book, tucked into escort-card displays, or waiting at each place setting as part of the table design.

Budget-wise, they're also one of the friendlier corners of wedding spending. Per guest, a photo magnet typically costs less than a fancy favor box filled with things nobody wants, and unlike consumable favors, the value doesn't disappear when it's used. A guest who eats your artisanal chocolate has a nice memory of it. A guest who takes home your magnet has a reminder of your wedding every morning for a decade. When couples talk about wanting favors that "actually feel like us," this is usually what they mean — something personal, useful, and impossible to mistake for a generic gesture.

If there's one piece of advice seasoned couples pass along, it's this: order a few extra. More than a few. Guests take them for relatives who couldn't attend. Your wedding party will want doubles. You'll want a pristine set for yourselves, and one for each set of parents. Wedding photo magnets have a way of becoming the item everyone quietly asks about afterward — "any chance there's a spare one of those?" — and future-you will be grateful for the cushion.

4. Save the Date Magnets: The Announcement That Sticks Around

If wedding photo magnets are about remembering the day, save the date magnets are about making sure the day actually happens on everyone's calendar. They solve the oldest problem in wedding stationery: the save the date card that gets read, admired, set on the counter, buried under mail, and quietly lost — along with the date itself.

The magnet version sidesteps that whole chain of events. When your save the date is a magnet, guests open the envelope, smile at your photo, and do the most natural thing in the world: they walk it straight to the fridge and stick it up. No decision required, no "I'll put this somewhere safe" (the famous last words of lost paperwork). From that moment until your wedding, your date lives in the highest-traffic spot in their home. Every time they reach for the mustard, there's your face and your date, gently doing its job. Wedding planners love them for exactly this reason — a save the date that can't be lost is a save the date that works.

There's a design conversation worth having here, because a save the date magnet has to do two things at once: it has to be a lovely photo object, and it has to communicate information clearly. The photo sets the emotional tone — joyful, romantic, playful, whatever feels like you as a couple — while the text carries the logistics: your names, the date, and usually the city or venue area so out-of-town guests can start thinking about travel. The best designs keep the text minimal and legible. "Jess & Marco · 06.12.2027 · Austin, Texas" tells a guest everything they need. The detailed stuff — hotel blocks, the schedule, the registry — belongs on the wedding website and the formal invitation, not squeezed onto three square inches of magnet.

That restraint is harder than it sounds, because couples understandably want to include everything. Resist. A cluttered save the date magnet is like a movie poster covered in credits — the information is technically there, but nobody can find the title. Give the photo room to breathe, let the date be the visual anchor, and add a small line like "Formal invitation to follow" or your wedding website address if you like. That's a complete, polished save the date.

Timing matters too. Save the dates typically go out six to twelve months before the wedding, and magnets fit that window perfectly — early enough for guests to plan travel, close enough that the date feels real. Because they're flat, light, and sturdy, they mail beautifully in standard envelopes, usually without the postage surprises that come with bulky or rigid stationery. Do consider a slightly protective envelope or a thin cardstock backing, mostly to keep edges pristine in transit, and you'll want to mail a test one to yourself first — a five-minute experiment that tells you exactly what your guests will receive.

One underrated benefit: save the date magnets set the visual tone for your whole wedding. The photo, the fonts, the colors — they're the first taste guests get of your celebration's personality. Couples who carry that style through to their invitations, signage, and even their wedding photo magnet favors create a thread that ties the entire event together. Guests notice, even if they can't articulate why everything felt so cohesive.

And here's the epilogue nobody tells you about: long after the wedding, the save the date magnet stays. Visit friends five years later and you'll often find it still on their fridge — a little time capsule of who you were when you announced you'd be getting married. Some couples say guests' fridges become accidental archives of their love story: the save the date magnet, then the favor magnet, then eventually a birth announcement magnet. Few pieces of stationery get that kind of afterlife.

5. Choosing the Right Photos (This Part Matters More Than You Think)

Here's a secret from the printing world: the single biggest factor in how your magnets turn out isn't the printer, the material, or the finish. It's the photo you choose. A great photo makes a modest magnet look stunning; a poor one undermines even premium printing. The good news is that picking a great one is mostly about knowing what to look for.

Start with resolution, because it's the one technical requirement that isn't negotiable. Photos pulled from social media are usually compressed — they look fine on a phone screen but turn soft and pixelated in print. Whenever possible, go back to the original file from the camera or phone. As a rough guide, a photo that looks sharp when you zoom in on your computer will print sharply at magnet size; one that gets blurry when you zoom will get blurrier in print. When in doubt, bigger files are better files. If a photographer took your pictures, ask for the high-resolution versions — that's exactly what they're for.

Lighting comes next. Photos taken in good, even light — outdoors on a bright day, near a window, during golden hour — print beautifully because they have detail in both the bright and dark areas. Photos taken in dim restaurants or under harsh flash often lose that detail in print, and faces can come out flat or shadowy. If you have a choice between a technically perfect posed shot in bad light and a slightly imperfect candid in gorgeous light, the candid usually wins on a magnet. Warmth beats polish almost every time, because a magnet is an emotional object before it's a photographic one.

Think about composition at magnet scale, which is smaller than you might instinctively picture. A sweeping group shot of thirty people looks impressive on a laptop; shrunk to a few inches, it becomes a crowd of indistinguishable heads. Photos that work best at small sizes have clear, close subjects — two faces filling much of the frame, a child's grin, a dog mid-leap. Leave a little breathing room around your subjects too, especially if you're adding text; text needs somewhere to sit, and a photo cropped tight to the edges can make names and dates feel squeezed in.

Color and contrast deserve a quick thought as well. Prints almost always render slightly differently from backlit screens — a touch deeper, a touch less luminous. Photos with decent contrast and clear colors handle that shift gracefully; very dark or very washed-out photos amplify it. You don't need to be a photo editor to compensate. Most phones' basic edit tools — a nudge of brightness, a touch of contrast — are enough to prep a photo for print. If your photos will hang on a stainless-steel fridge, cooler, moodier photos look striking against the metal; warm, golden photos glow against white fridges. It's a small thing, but it's the kind of small thing that makes people say "wow" without knowing why.

Finally, the most important criterion has nothing to do with technique: pick photos that make you feel something. The magnet that gets kept for ten years is rarely the most technically flawless one. It's the one where your grandfather is laughing so hard he's blurry, or the one from the exact second the confetti hit. When you're torn between options, hold each one and notice your reaction. The photo that makes you smile without thinking is the photo that belongs on a magnet.

6. Sizes, Shapes, Finishes, and Materials

Once you've got your photos sorted, the fun begins: deciding what your magnets will actually look and feel like. None of these choices is make-or-break on its own, but together they determine whether your magnets feel like thoughtful keepsakes or afterthoughts.

Size is the first decision, and it's really a question of purpose. Small magnets — around two inches square — are charming and economical, ideal for big batches like wedding favors, class reunions, or team photos where you need one for everyone. They suit close-up portraits and bold, simple designs. Medium sizes, in the three-to-four-inch range, are the all-rounders: big enough to show a couples' photo with names and a date, small enough to feel at home among the other residents of a busy fridge door. Large magnets, five inches and up, make a statement — they're the right call for a stunning landscape, a detailed family portrait, or a save the date where the photo deserves center stage. If you're adding much text, size up; cramped text on a small magnet is the fastest route to a cluttered look.

Shape is subtler but changes the personality of the piece. Rectangles echo classic photographs and postcards, so they feel timeless — the safe, elegant default for weddings. Squares read as modern and playful, especially with a white border that mimics an instant print. Circles and hearts lean whimsical and work wonderfully for baby announcements, pet photos, and lighthearted favors. Rounded corners are the quiet upgrade: they soften any design, resist dog-earing, and give a finished, considered feel for essentially no extra effort.

Finish — glossy or matte — is mostly about mood and practicality. Glossy makes colors pop and gives photos a lively, almost wet-looking richness; it's gorgeous for vibrant images like beach scenes, fall foliage, and colorful party shots. The tradeoff is fingerprints and glare under direct kitchen lighting. Matte softens everything into an elegant, gallery-like finish, hides fingerprints, and stays readable from any angle — a favorite for wedding stationery and black-and-white photos, where it adds instant sophistication. If you can't decide, matte is the more forgiving choice for mixed lighting, glossy the more dramatic one for colorful images.

As for the magnet material itself, flexible magnetic sheeting is the everyday champion — light, shatterproof, envelope-friendly, and strong enough to hold real papers. It's what most wedding favors and save the dates are made from, and for good reason. Rigid magnets feel premium in the hand, almost like miniature tiles, and make lovely one-off gifts, though they cost more to mail and can chip if dropped on a hard floor. Whichever you choose, pay attention to magnetic strength: a magnet that can't hold a birthday card without sliding is a magnet that ends up in a drawer. Quality suppliers use backing that grips firmly and stays put for years, which is ultimately what turns a print into a permanent resident of someone's kitchen.

7. Design Tips That Make Magnets Look Professional

You don't need a graphic design degree to make a beautiful photo magnet, but a handful of principles will lift yours from "homemade" to "where did you get these?" — the question every host and every couple secretly hopes to hear.

The first principle is restraint. One photo, one idea, one message. The most common design mistake is trying to honor everything at once: the photo plus names plus date plus venue plus quote plus hashtag plus monogram. On a three-inch canvas, that's not a design, it's a yard sale. Decide what the magnet is for. If it's a save the date, the photo and the date are the story — everything else is a footnote. If it's a favor, the photo is the story and your names are the signature. Let the magnet say one thing well.

Typography comes second, and the rule is equally simple: one or two fonts, chosen for legibility at small sizes. A clean serif or an unfussy script for names paired with a simple sans-serif for the date covers nearly every wedding style from black-tie to backyard.

What to avoid: novelty fonts, all-caps scripts (beautiful at invitation size, unreadable at magnet size), and text smaller than you'd comfortably read at arm's length. A useful test is to view your design at actual size on screen, then step back two paces. If you can still read the date without squinting, your guests' grandparents can too.

Contrast between text and photo is where many DIY designs quietly stumble. White text over a bright sky disappears; dark text over a dark suit disappears; text over a busy background disappears no matter the color. The fixes are easy: place text over calm areas of the image — open sky, soft backgrounds, blurred greenery — or give it a subtle aid like a soft shadow, a thin contrasting outline, or a gentle translucent band behind the words. None of these tricks are visible as "effects" when done lightly; they just make the words effortlessly readable.

Borders and white space are your friends. A slim white border instantly gives any photo that instant-film charm people adore, and it has a practical benefit: it forgives tiny trimming variances, so every magnet in the batch looks identical even if the cut shifts a hair. Leaving breathing room around your text and subjects — not pushing anything tight against the edges — is the single fastest way to make a design feel calm and expensive.

Finally, design for the destination. Your magnet will live on a fridge surrounded by visual noise: notes, lists, kids' art, other magnets. Designs with a clear focal point and a bit of simplicity hold their own in that environment, while intricate designs get visually swallowed. If you're ordering favors or save the dates, it's worth ordering a single proof first, sticking it on your own fridge, and living with it for a day. You'll notice things — a date that's a shade too small, a crop that cuts a little close — that no amount of on-screen staring would reveal. That's not being fussy; that's how professionals work, one proof at a time.

8. Beyond Weddings: Other Moments That Deserve a Magnet

Weddings may be the headliner, but photo magnets have a whole supporting career in the rest of life's occasions — honestly, anywhere there's a moment people want to keep visible.

New parents were probably the original magnet power users. Birth announcement magnets solve the classic problem of the beautiful card that gets read once and filed away; a magnet version goes straight onto grandparents' fridges, where the baby's face greets the family every morning. The tradition tends to continue: first birthdays, first days of school, yearly "how they've grown" magnets that quietly build a timeline across the fridge door. Families who start this ritual end up with something better than a photo album — a living, growing gallery in the room where everyone actually gathers.

Holidays are natural magnet territory too. The annual family photo, the kids in matching pajamas, the dog in the reindeer antlers he clearly resents — turned into magnets, these become the holiday card people keep instead of recycle. Small businesses have caught on as well: a calendar magnet or a photo magnet with a company's details is one of the few promotional items that earns permanent placement in a customer's home rather than a trip to the bin. There's a reason real estate agents and local trades have sworn by fridge magnets for decades — visibility is everything, and the fridge is the most-viewed billboard in the house. When the goal is staying visible in someone's daily life, fridge magnets with a photo on them beat almost every other format for cost and staying power.

Graduations, anniversaries, milestone birthdays, retirement parties — each one has its own magnet logic. A graduation magnet with the cap-and-gown shot becomes a fixture on proud parents' fridges (and their offices, and their lockers at the gym). A 25th-anniversary magnet pairing a then-and-now photo tells a whole love story in three inches. Pet people need no convincing at all; a great photo of the family dog is, to a certain kind of household, the most important art they own.

Then there are the quieter uses, which might be the most meaningful. Memorial magnets — a beloved photo, a name, dates — give families a gentle, everyday way to keep someone present. Travelers turn their best shots into magnet sets, building a map of their adventures on the fridge instead of buying souvenir-shop versions of places they actually visited. Teachers make magnet sets of class photos. Coaches make them for end-of-season gifts. Clubs, choirs, teams, and reunion committees all eventually discover the same thing: people keep magnets. In a world drowning in stuff, that's a rare and valuable property.

The common thread across all of these is that photo magnets work best for moments people want to see repeatedly, not just remember occasionally. A memory that only surfaces when you open an app is a memory that fades. A memory on the fridge surfaces every day, uninvited, in the middle of ordinary life — which is exactly when small joys do the most good.

9. How to Order Without Regrets

Ordering custom photo magnets is straightforward, but a few hard-won lessons will save you from the handful of mistakes that account for nearly every disappointing order.

Start with the photos, not the cart. Gather your candidates, check their resolution at full zoom, do your brightness-and-contrast nudges, and only then start designing. Designing around a weak photo just produces an elegant layout of a blurry picture. If you're ordering for a wedding, this is also the moment to confirm you have the high-resolution files from your photographer rather than the web-sized versions from the online gallery — a five-minute email that prevents the most common quality complaint in the entire industry.

Proof before you commit, in two stages. Stage one is the digital proof: check every name, every date, every letter, then have one other human check them too, because the brain reads what it expects to read and "06.12" versus "06.21" is exactly the kind of typo that slips past the person who typed it. Stage two, for any order that matters — save the dates, favors, gifts — is a physical proof or a small first batch. Screens glow; print doesn't. Colors, contrast, and text size all read differently on a physical magnet in your actual kitchen light, and finding that out with one magnet instead of two hundred is the cheapest insurance in custom printing.

Think about quantity honestly, then add a margin. Favors have a way of disappearing faster than headcounts suggest — guests take extras for family, the wedding party pockets spares, a few vanish into the venue's lost-and-found dimension. Ten to fifteen percent over your count is the calm, experienced move, and the per-piece cost of that cushion is usually trivial. For save the dates, count households rather than guests, then add extras for the inevitable "we forgot your college roommate's new address" discoveries.

Timeline deserves more respect than it usually gets. Custom printing involves production time plus shipping time plus — if you're mailing save the dates or thank-you magnets — postal time on top of that. Working backward from your mail-out date and adding a buffer week turns a stressful countdown into a relaxed one. Ordering wedding favors six weeks out instead of two also leaves room to fix anything unexpected, which is the difference between a minor hiccup and a minor crisis.

Lastly, look at what the seller tells you about materials. A shop confident in its printing will tell you about its magnetic strength, its protective finish, and its print process, and will stand behind the result. Vague listings with stock photos and no material details are a gamble. Custom photo magnets are inexpensive enough that the difference between mediocre and excellent is a few dollars across an entire order — which makes choosing quality the easiest decision in the whole process.

10. Common Questions, Honest Answers

Will photo magnets damage my photos or my fridge?

No to both. Quality photo magnets are the photo — printed directly for the purpose — and flexible magnets are gentle on fridge surfaces. If you're cautious, lift rather than slide them when rearranging, and wipe the door occasionally; dust trapped under any object can scuff a glossy appliance over years of sliding. Normal use is completely safe.

How long do they actually last?

Years, comfortably — a decade isn't unusual for a well-made magnet kept out of prolonged direct sunlight. The protective finish handles kitchen steam and splashes, and the magnetic backing doesn't meaningfully weaken with age. Fridge life is the environment they're built for.

Can I use photos from my phone?

Absolutely — modern phone cameras take print-quality photos, especially at magnet sizes. Just use the original file rather than a screenshot or a version saved from social media or messaging apps, all of which compress images. If someone texts you the perfect photo, ask them to send the full-resolution original.

How far in advance should I order save the date magnets?

Save the dates themselves typically go out six to twelve months before the wedding. Count backward from your mail-out date, allow for production and shipping, and give yourself a buffer. Ordering two to three months before you plan to mail is relaxed; one month is workable; two weeks is an adrenaline sport.

Glossy or matte — seriously, which one?

Glossy for vibrant, colorful photos and playful designs; matte for weddings, portraits, black-and-white images, and anything with text you want readable from every angle. When truly torn, matte is the safer all-rounder.

Are photo magnets tacky as wedding favors?

This question comes from an era of flimsy novelty magnets, and it's outdated. A well-printed photo magnet of a moment your guests care about is personal, useful, and durable — the three things a good favor needs. Judge by what guests actually do: favors get left on tables constantly, and photo magnets almost never are.

What should the text on a save the date magnet include?

Your names, the wedding date, and the city or general location. Optionally a short "formal invitation to follow" or your wedding website. Everything else can wait — clarity is the whole point.

11. Final Thoughts

There's a reason this guide keeps circling back to the same image: someone's kitchen, morning light, a refrigerator door covered in the evidence of a life being lived. The fridge is the one gallery every household already has, already curates, and already visits a dozen times a day. Photo magnets are simply the way your best moments get admitted to that gallery — and once they're in, they tend to stay for years.

Custom photo magnets ask very little of you. Choose photos that make you feel something, keep the design simple, pick a size and finish that suit the occasion, proof your text, order a few extras. That's genuinely the whole craft. What you get back is wildly disproportionate to the effort: wedding favors guests actually keep, save the dates that can't get lost, gifts that outlast flowers and outlive cards, and daily reminders — for you and for everyone you love — of the moments worth remembering.

In a world where our photos pile up unseen by the thousand, that's a small, sticky, quietly wonderful thing. Pick the photos that make you smile without thinking, and put them where life actually happens.
